There is no Leap Day this year but there was in 1940, when Gone with the Wind emerged on the night of February 29th as the big winner at the 12th Academy Awards, setting a record at the time by taking home eight competitive Oscars (plus two honorary Oscars), including Best Picture. The ceremony was held at the Cocoanut Grove nightclub in the Ambassador Hotel, one of LA's premiere night spots, with Bob Hope hosting for the first of his 19 turns at the helm. Over the years, the Oscar ceremony has landed mostly between mid-February and early April, although this year, the pandemic has pushed it back to April 25th, the latest date in Oscar history. In some quarters, the reputation of David O. Selznick's Gone with the Wind has been tarnished by its nostalgic portrayal of the ante-bellum South, which has fallen out of step with modern sensibilities. However, in 1939 and for many decades to follow, Gone with the Wind was celebrated as one of Hollywood's finest jewels. The epic historical romance was based on Margaret Mitchell's best-selling 1936 novel, itself one of the most successful books in history with one million copies sold in its first six months. Gone with the Wind was the ultimate event film, billed as "The greatest screen entertainment of all time!" Even the film's production was followed breathlessly, with Selznick conducting a much-publicized nationwide search to cast the perfect actress to play Scarlett O'Hara, opposite Clark Gable's Rhett Butler. Vivien Leigh was selected, of course, going on to win an Oscar for Best Actress that night at the Cocoanut Grove, 81 years ago.

Amazon Moves From Film Industry's Margins to the Mainstream (New York Times)

Amazon Studios is transforming itself from a distributor working on the margins of the film industry to a purveyor of mainstream fare with widespread, international appeal. In its early days, Amazon established its reputation with independent films that were well-received by critics and favored by the art house crowd. Manchester by the Sea (2016) and The Big Sick (2017) were among its best-known and most successful titles. At the same time, the company Amazon was building up an audience for its entertainment by leveraging its dominant position in on-line shopping, with Amazon Prime Video sporting 150M active subscribers. Last year, when the pandemic hit and theatrical releases were frozen, streamers stepped in to pick up the slack. While Netflix, Apple and Hulu have all benefitted, Amazon has been among the most active in acquiring and marketing its content. Next Friday, Amazon Prime Video will premiere Coming 2 America, the sequel to the 1988 original starring Eddie Murphy and Arsenio Hall. Amazon acquired the title from Paramount Pictures, which had originally planned on a theatrical release for the film. The studio made headlines last October with the successful release of Sasha Baron Cohen's political satire Borat Subsequent Moviefilm, opening two weeks before last year's presidential election. Even while experiencing more widespread success, Amazon is still vying for recognition in this year's awards contests, with nominations in major categories for Borat, One Night in Miami and Sound of Metal. Once the pandemic lifts, Amazon Studio's chief Jennifer Salke expects that a greater portion of its major film releases will be developed internally, rather than acquiring product from other studios.

New York City Movie Theaters Can Finally Reopen. Will People Return? (Variety)

Last Monday, NY governor Andrew Cuomo announced that movie theatres within the five boroughs of New York City would be allowed to resume operation as of Friday, March 5th. The re-opening of the city's theatres marks a significant milestone on the road to recovery for exhibition, and for the movie business overall. New York is not only a population center – the largest city in the US – but it is also a hub for media and advertising. Hollywood relies on the city's entertainment press to focus attention on its new film releases. The year-long closure of theatres in New York and Los Angeles has been a key factor cited by studio executives for holding back on releasing their big-budget films. Many industry watchers also expect Los Angeles to follow New York's lead and announce plans to re-open theatres in the weeks ahead. Caution will prevail in the early days of re-opening, with capacity limited to 25% of the pre-pandemic maximum occupancy and mandatory masking. In addition, operators have been required to upgrade air filtration systems, eliminate self-service concessions and enforce seat blocking patterns in their auditoriums. Despite these restrictions, which make it nearly impossible to turn a profit, New York's exhibitors are relieved to be able to welcome customers back to their theatres.

Paramount Pictures Boss Jim Gianopulos: "We Believe In The Power Of Theatrical...Audiences Will Enthusiastically Return" (Deadline)

Paramount is the latest major studio in Hollywood to unveil its plans to change the theatrical release window. In a presentation to investors with details on the launch of its new Paramount+ streaming services, the studio reaffirmed its commitment to theatrical releasing while at the same time recognizing the central role that streaming has assumed in distribution. Studio head Jim Gianopulos announced that its upcoming tentpoles Mission: Impossible 7 and A Quiet Place 2 will become available on Paramount+ 45 days after their theatrical debut, cutting in half the traditional 90-day release window. One year ago, this announcement would have registered as a blow for exhibition, but now in 2021 it seems downright generous, given the less theatre-friendly approaches announced first by Universal and then by Warner Bros. The studio suggests that a 45-day window is the best balance to maximize the box office while still giving consumers the opportunity to watch these titles at home as PVD rentals while they are still fresh. Gianopulos explained, "We believe in the power of theatrical releases and we have faith that after things get back to normal, audiences will enthusiastically return to theaters. At the same time, consumers have increasingly embraced streaming as another way to enjoy films. Our strategy accounts for both."

Telluride Film Festival Set for in-Person Event September 2-6 (IndieWire)

The dates for the 2021 Telluride Film Festival have been announced, with the fall festival in the Rockies to take place from September 2–6. Festival organizers expressed confidence that a fully in-person event could be held by that time. Last year, the 2020 edition of the festival was cancelled due to the travel restrictions and public health concerns from the expanding coronavirus pandemic.

Now that 14% of the US population has received at least one dose of the vaccine and caseloads nationwide continue to recede, confidence is growing that all parts of the movie business are on a path to re-opening. Telluride is among the most prestigious film festivals in the US, with last year's scheduled lineup of premieres including leading awards contenders Nomadland and The Father.

Imax CEO Richard Gelfond on What China's Huge Theatrical Recovery Means for Hollywood (Hollywood Reporter)

The Chinese box office broke records this year during the annual Lunar New Year's holiday two weeks ago. The Middle Kingdom turned in a $1.2B box office week, led by local blockbuster sequel Detective Chinatown 3, which contributed $600M to the total. IMAX Theatres enjoyed a handsome share of this box office success, as a result of its 20+ year investment to establish itself as a leading exhibitor in China and other Asian territories. IMAX was among the first to experience the collapse of moviegoing last year when the COVID-19 pandemic broke out in China, but is now on the leading edge of its recovery. China and many other Asian markets have tamed the outbreak for the most part, leading to a re-opening of exhibition and re-start of local studio releases.

In an interview with the Hollywood Reporter, IMAX's CEO Rich Gelfond offers his opinion on future prospects for the theatrical experience, including skepticism about Warner Bros.' day-date strategy and his expectations for IMAX theatres in both the Chinese and US markets. "People's perceptions of the future are always wildly exaggerated by the present. I think when the pandemic started, nobody could imagine that it would last this long or change things this radically in such a short period of time. And I think the same thing is going to happen with reopening, which is what was demonstrated in China."

Cinemark Shines Without the Drama (Wall Street Journal)

Because its corporate fate has hung in the balance so publicly, AMC Theatres has drawn much of the attention in the media. However, the next tier among the largest exhibitors may be better positioned for success as the industry re-opens. In particular, analysts cite that Cinemark, the country's third largest exhibitor, appears to have a number of strengths. They have minimal debt on the books, which allows them to invest in new opportunities as the recovery kicks in. They have also over-performed expectations financially during the pandemic, based on managing costs closely and generating revenues with innovative offers such as private watch parties, with this rental business accounting for nearly one quarter of their Q4 revenue. Last week, analyst Michael Pachter of Wedbush Securities predicted that Cinemark will "come out of the pandemic relatively unscathed." but that "it will be years before AMC is able to revisit its prior growth strategy as it repays its growing mountain of debt."

GOWER STREET'S Box Office Outlook

One Long Year – The US Movie Theaters That Have Remained Closed Since March 2020

Almost a year has passed from when the number of movie theaters operating in North America started to sink significantly due to the COVID-19 crisis. Nearly a quarter (23%) of all US movie theaters have stayed closed since March 2020! These locations generated a combined yearly box office of $1.8 billion on average in 2018 and 2019.

Over the March 13-15 weekend in 2020 most theatres were still open, but the threat of COVID-19 was already causing the lowest three-day weekend result since September 2000. March 15 saw closure orders in New York City and Los Angeles. Within two days less than 40% of domestic theatres were operating. A week later it was under 4%, before hitting rock bottom in April with 1%. This number started to improve slowly from the end of May up to 19% of movie theaters open by market share in mid-August. The re-opening accelerated from that point in the build up to the release of TENET on September 3, when 56% of movie theaters by market share were open. This positive trend peaked at the end of the month with 61%. It stayed there for just two weeks before a triangle-of-troubles - Lack of Product / Re-closing of movie theaters / New or further rise in COVID-19 cases - put the brakes on recovery. By the end of the year the number of movie theaters open by market share had fallen to 38%.

Since the beginning of 2021 the situation has improved slightly. A slow re-opening, up to 43% as of the middle of February, has taken place.

Although less than half of all US movie theaters are currently open, most have at least taken the chance to re-open once or more after being forced to close last year. However, many have never re-opened their doors to audiences since they turned out the lights in their auditoriums in March 2020. To understand the structure of closure and re-opening Gower Street Analytics utilized data from our partners at Comscore. Of the 5,253 movie theaters they tracked across the US in 2020, we took the last reported day of each individual cinema as most recent day of operation.

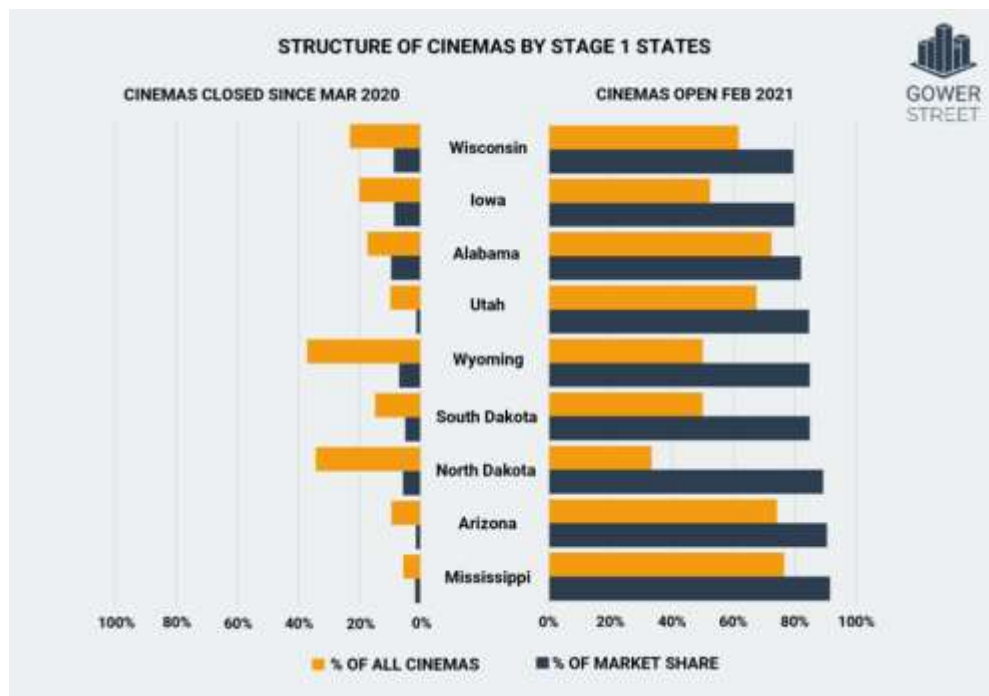

The movie theaters that haven't re-opened in the last 11 months were, in general, lower grossing locations. While the 1,210 movie theaters that last reported in March 2020 are 23% of all tracked US movie theaters, they represent just 18% of the market share. In contrast the locations currently open in February are 42% of the tracked US movie theaters representing 43% of the market share, thus slightly over-indexing in box office performance.

This observation is even more visible within the nine US states that already reached a significant majority, 80% by market share, of movie theaters in operation. This represents Stage 1 of Gower Streets Blueprint To Recovery, a base from which to build on. As of February 22, the following states are at or above this level: Alabama, Arizona, Iowa, Mississippi, North Dakota, South Dakota, Utah, Wisconsin and Wyoming. In each of these nine US states the market share of the movie theaters closed since March is significantly lower than the percentage of total locations those theaters represent in the state. At the same time, the market share of theaters currently open in these states outstrips the percentage of total locations represented by double digit percentage points.

The graph below highlights these in detail, with the state's market share of theaters in dark blue and the percentage of physical locations across the state in orange. On the left, for the movie theaters closed continuously since March, all orange bars are clearly bigger than the dark blue bars. This is opposite among movie theaters currently open, displayed on the right.

The described disparate allocation of the market share of open theaters and percentage of physical sites operating correlates with the number of screens these locations have. The movie theaters that were closed for the last 11 months entirely generally have a lower number of screens. In fact, more than half of them (55%) have five or fewer screens. This is significantly higher than the norm (42%) of all movie theaters in the US. Of the movie theaters currently open only 32% have five or fewer screens.

Looking at the nine states already at Stage 1 of their Blueprint to Recovery, this phenomenon is even more clear. Movie theaters with less than five screens represent 75% of the locations that have remained closed since March across all these states, while the average among all theatres there is just 52%. Of the current open houses, only 39% have five or fewer screens. Single screen theaters are especially evident amongst the share of the long-closed movie theaters. They account for half of all movie theaters in these nine states that have not opened since March 2020!

Based on this data, it is evident that primarily the lower grossing movie theaters and the ones with fewer screens are those that have not operated at any point since the pandemic forced them to close. Given the restrictions and security measures in place movie theaters with more screens often have a wider range of tools to maintain their business. Moreover, movie theaters that even in pre-pandemic times were generating box office at the lower end of the range, find it even more challenging to achieve a critical amount to make an opening worth trying with the limited supply of attractive content.

When the pandemic fades and the market moves ahead on the road to recovery it will be noteworthy to see how many of the longest closed movie theaters will turn on the lights again. Some have already had to close permanently, such as Charlotte, North Carolina's oldest movie theater the Regal Manor Twin, which had been in operation since 1947. Let's hope most of those yet to re-open will have the resources to return, adapt to market challenges and flourish when they are able to do so.

MARTIN GROVE'S Hollywood Report

It's taken nearly a year, but NYC cinemas finally have a green light to re-open starting 3/5 and insiders expect L.A. to follow suit soon.

Between ineffective film industry lobbying and movie-hating politicians in NY & Calif., exhibitors have endured a hideous year when higher risk activities were allowed to resume with capacity restrictions. Amazingly, airlines were permitted to fly packed planes without observing social distancing or capacity limits.

Nonetheless, the outlook for moviegoing is significantly brighter now than just a week ago. Hollywood's refusal to launch big movies without NY & LA theatres in which to play them will evaporate once LA re-opens. It's highly encouraging that moviegoing in China snapped back quickly and incredibly well. Two China-produced blockbusters – HI MOM & DETECTIVE CHINATOWN 3 – each just grossed $619M+ for their first two weeks in theatres!

NYC's 3/5 return is particularly good news for Disney's PG animated RAYA AND THE LAST DRAGON (pictured), which hits theatres that day. It's tracking impressively with above-norm definite interest scores that are strongest with +25M & very good with all other demos.

By the time you read this, you may know Sunday's 78th Golden Globes winners – but what really matters is who was nominated.

In pre-pandemic years that's what ensured which boldface names would be there at the Beverly Hilton to drive what NBC, Dick Clark productions & the HFPA brilliantly marketed as "Hollywood's Party of the Year."

Having survived 2 decades of those "fun" nights in person over the years (pictured – GG tickets from 20 years ago), I can tell you they were mostly routine awards nights with familiar faces making familiar acceptances. What made it work for TV was that those speeches were fueled by magnums of champagne on every table – plus mini-bottles with straws for those (nearly everyone!) who spent the night tablehopping around the BH.

Sunday would have been Oscar Night, but COVID sent the Academy scurrying to the likely safety of 4/25 and the HFPA grabbed 2/28. Because the pandemic didn't end in time, a "virtual party" plan had GG winners accepting from home and Amy Poehler & Tina Fey co-hosting from the BH & NY's Rainbow Room. Since Oscar noms voting doesn't start until 3/5, GG winners may have a big advantage this year.
